studies. It was estimated that more than 100,000 cases of chlamydia occur annually in the United States. In persons infected with chlamydia, the immune system produces an antibody known as IgG, which is responsible for the inflammatory response. Antibody-producing capacity is generally thought to be sustained in the serum. In patients with chlamydia, serum levels of IgG antibody were found to be elevated within 1 year after the infection. However, there were gaps in the correlation between the elevated antibody in blood and the disease. It is not clear whether specific chlamydia tests can provide accurate results if treatment, genital hygiene, and/or sexual behavior is not followed. Previous laboratory tests for chlamydia have been less specific. They were sensitive to additional bacterial infections, such as gonorrhea, for example, and did not distinguish between blood samples from "positive" patients (infected) and "negative" patients (not infected). The new IgG test for chlamydia can distinguish the blood test of the infected from the blood test of the noninfected. The research was funded by the National Institutes of Health. The study was published in the Journal of Clinical Microbiology.
