studies. It was estimated that more than 100,000 cases of chlamydia occur annually in the United States. In persons infected with chlamydia, the immune system produces an antibody known as IgG, which is responsible for the inflammatory response. Antibody-producing capacity is generally thought to be exhausted in 6 to 12 months, but patients with chlamydia have been shown to be seronegative 12 to 18 months after infection. It is not clear why the immune system does not respond adequately to the infection. It is possible that the immune system is not responding properly because the bacteria have been able to evade the immune system. It is also possible that the immune system is not responding properly because the bacteria have been able to evade the immune system.
