After each feeding event, a certain amount of food will be "assimilated" (i.e., absorbed) by the organism. This food is then used for various purposes, such as growth, reproduction, and maintenance of the organism.

Assimilation Rate: The rate at which food is assimilated by the organism. This rate is determined by the amount of food available and the organism's metabolic rate. It is usually expressed as a percentage of the total food intake.

Food Intake (g/day) vs. Assimilation Rate (%)

When food intake is low, the assimilation rate is high. As food intake increases, the assimilation rate decreases, approaching a maximum value of 100%.

Two Types of Food

There are two types of food: solid food and liquid food. Solid food is typically more difficult to digest than liquid food, and it takes longer to assimilate.
