

“Young Goodman Brown” and “The Alchemist”: Comparison

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

In essence, most novels, myths, fairy tales, or movies are similar in that they have specific adventures rife with various trials, obstacles, and conflicts the central heroes should endure to reach particular goals. In this regard, Joseph Campbell developed his universal template of stories, named the monomyth, or the Hero's Journey, that contains twelve stages that generally fall under three acts: Departure, Initiation, and Return. Therefore, this paper aims at providing the analysis and comparison of two pieces of literature, namely, “Young Goodman Brown” by Nathaniel Hawthorne and “The Alchemist” by Paulo Coelho. Despite distinct underlying themes of these works, both main characters become involved in risky and mysterious ventures that have different outcomes herewith.

Comparison

According to Campbell's monomyth, the first stage of the story is The Ordinary World where heroes lead their typical lives before the upcoming adventures. The first work contains scarce details about Goodman Brown's previous life, only indicating that he has married his beloved wife Faith for three months. It is impossible to identify what Brown deals with, his features and character, but it can be assumed that he is a simple, average man. Concerning the Call To Adventure, Hawthorne also does not describe the circumstances or the clear reasons that urge the main Goodman to venture forth. The narration only specifies a mysterious errand in the forest, which should be completed by this night (Hawthorne 1). Simultaneously, “The Alchemist” sufficiently recounts the main hero named Santiago who enjoys the humble life of a shepherd and only desires to have a little wine and a book in his handbag. The Journey's second element is explicitly revealed via a recurring weird dream where a child promises a hidden treasure in the Egyptian pyramids.
