Responding to exercise

During exercise, your body needs more oxygen for energy and more carbon dioxide is produced. The circulatory and respiratory systems must respond to these demands. During exercise, the heart pumps more blood to the muscles and the lungs take in more oxygen. The respiratory system also responds by increasing the rate of breathing. The body also responds by increasing the rate of blood flow to the muscles. These responses are coordinated by the nervous system, which sends signals to the heart and lungs to increase their activity.
