There is a growing body of evidence that suggests that the use of a single, standard, or "one-size-fits-all" approach to the treatment of patients with mental illness is not only ineffective but also potentially harmful. This is because the needs and experiences of individuals with mental illness are highly diverse, and a one-size-fits-all approach may not address the specific needs of each individual. Instead, a more personalized, or "tailored," approach to treatment is needed, one that takes into account the unique characteristics of each individual and the specific challenges they face. This approach is often referred to as "personalized medicine" or "precision medicine," and it is becoming increasingly common in the field of mental health care.
