► The two languages – separated by more than 1000 miles – share a common ancestor (proto-Indo-European) and share numerous, but not all, morphological and syntactic features. The two languages developed in much the same way, following similar but distinct paths, and the two languages share many other characteristics. The two languages (the roots of which are the same) have produced 1000 languages and counting, most belonging to Indo-European and the languages involved in the process of creating a new one.
