

Remembering: 1.3.1

1. The three main types of learning are classical conditioning, operant conditioning, and observational learning.
2. Classical conditioning is a type of learning in which a neutral stimulus is paired with an unconditioned stimulus to elicit a conditioned response.

Classical conditioning is a type of learning in which a neutral stimulus is paired with an unconditioned stimulus to elicit a conditioned response. The unconditioned stimulus is a stimulus that naturally elicits a response, while the conditioned stimulus is a stimulus that has been learned to elicit a response. For example, if a dog is repeatedly fed at the same time each day, it will learn to associate the time of day with the arrival of food. As a result, the dog will begin to salivate at the time of day, even if no food is present.

3. Operant conditioning is a type of learning in which a behavior is strengthened or weakened by the consequences that follow it.

Operant conditioning is a type of learning in which a behavior is strengthened or weakened by the consequences that follow it. The behavior is strengthened if it is followed by a reward, and it is weakened if it is followed by a punishment. For example, if a child is rewarded with a sticker for completing their homework, they will be more likely to complete their homework in the future. Conversely, if a child is punished with a time-out for not completing their homework, they will be less likely to not complete their homework in the future.

4. Observational learning is a type of learning in which a behavior is learned by watching someone else perform it.

Observational learning is a type of learning in which a behavior is learned by watching someone else perform it. This type of learning is often used in social settings, such as in a classroom or in a workplace. For example, a student might learn how to write an essay by watching a teacher write one. Similarly, an employee might learn how to perform a task by watching a more experienced employee perform it.

5. The three main types of learning are classical conditioning, operant conditioning, and observational learning.

The three main types of learning are classical conditioning, operant conditioning, and observational learning. Classical conditioning is a type of learning in which a neutral stimulus is paired with an unconditioned stimulus to elicit a conditioned response. Operant conditioning is a type of learning in which a behavior is strengthened or weakened by the consequences that follow it. Observational learning is a type of learning in which a behavior is learned by watching someone else perform it.

6. Classical conditioning is a type of learning in which a neutral stimulus is paired with an unconditioned stimulus to elicit a conditioned response.

Classical conditioning is a type of learning in which a neutral stimulus is paired with an unconditioned stimulus to elicit a conditioned response. The unconditioned stimulus is a stimulus that naturally elicits a response, while the conditioned stimulus is a stimulus that has been learned to elicit a response. For example, if a dog is repeatedly fed at the same time each day, it will learn to associate the time of day with the arrival of food.
