

States of Matter & Phase Changes

Notes

Substances can undergo a phase change into different states. Substances are in different states based on temperature and pressure. The state of a substance is determined by the relative strength of the attractive forces between its particles. In the solid state, the particles are closely packed and the attractive forces are strong. In the liquid state, the particles are less closely packed and the attractive forces are weaker. In the gaseous state, the particles are far apart and the attractive forces are very weak.
