From Heroine to Patriotic Volunteer Sally A. Hastings, 1985 The introduction of Western notions of social work and philanthropy to Japan provided an arena in which able Japanese women could exercise their talents on behalf of the nation In the Meiji Period 1868-1912 wealthy women patronized Western style charities such as the Japan Red Cross A few unusually able women followed the model of heroines such as Jane Addams of Hull House and founded orphanages and kindergartens for the poor As social work expanded in the Taisho Period 1912-1926 a few well educated women found employment as experts on women's and children's problems Many more women became support staff for welfare facilities The international crisis of the first decade of the Showa Period 1926 thrust Japanese women to assume the role of patriotic volunteer Through social work a wide variety of Japanese women became active in public affairs and a few women became known as public leaders Because Japan experienced industrialization as a late developing nation the role of women in social work was somewhat different in Japan than in Great Britain or the United States Women ventured only a limited social distance from their homes and the state played a major part in defining the proper place for women in social service Nevertheless the concept of social work provided a legitimate public role for women
