Introduction

White-collar crimes generally are of a commercial nature and occur in a business setup. The perpetrators of this crime are primarily motivated by financial gains, which define this form of crime. White-collar crimes are innumerable; however, the common ones include fraud, insider trading, embezzlement, computer crimes, copyright infringement, forgery, bribery, corruption, tax evasion, money laundering, and many other dishonest business schemes. Sutherland (1949) observes that "white-collar crimes are crimes committed by a person of respectability and high social status in the course of his occupation" (p.8). Since the offenders are professionals and people of high standing in society, they are intelligent, confident, affluent, and can conceal their criminal activities for relatively long from the law enforcers.

A Secret Crime

White-collar crimes do not get police attention and are less obvious because the perpetrators occupy executive offices; they, therefore, incorporate legitimate behavior with criminal pursuits. White-collar crimes are very complex because they involve sophisticated players and complex transactions (Shover & Wright, 2000, p.65). Perhaps, this crime finds a shield in the commerce culture of confidentiality. Confidential information is only in the hands of a few persons who may, in turn, use this privacy to fraud. White-collar crimes are distinct from blue-collar street crimes such as arson, burglary, theft assault, vandalism, and rape among others. Somehow, white-collar crimes receive little attention from the law enforcers as opposed to the high alertness for other crimes. The drive to engage in blue-collar crimes is attributed to psychological, associational, and structural factors. On the other hand, white-collar criminals are opportunists who take advantage of their position in society to fraud.
