Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical fitness of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a supervised walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of supervised walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group consisted of 20 women who did not participate in the walking program. The physical fitness of the women was measured at baseline and at 12 weeks. The measurements included heart rate, blood pressure, and body mass index. The results of the study showed that the women in the walking program had significantly lower heart rates and blood pressures at 12 weeks compared to the control group. There was no significant difference in body mass index between the two groups. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical fitness of sedentary, middle-aged women.

QUESTION — A 40-year-old woman presents with a 2-week history of fatigue, weight loss, and decreased appetite. She reports feeling "tired all the time" and has lost about 10 pounds (4.5 kg) without trying. She has noticed that her hair is falling out more than usual and that her skin feels dry. She has no other symptoms and no recent travel or contact with sick people. She has a long history of rheumatoid arthritis, treated with low-dose prednisone (5 mg daily) for the past 10 years. Her last blood test was 6 months ago, showing normal results. She is currently on no other medications. What is the most likely diagnosis?
