

Effect on capital is equal to amount initially, the investment minus all subsequent cash flows. The overall indicator of the investment being the NPV. If negative, then reject. If the investment returns after accounting for initial capital costs.

The investment may also run off if we reject to accept the project. It should, in this case, equal the return of the investment if it is negative within the range where the investment is not abandoned. This means the return of the investment.

- If capital is not rejected then the investment is not rejected, the investment may run off (if negative) for the entire range of capital.
