The Great Depression

The Significance

The Great Depression began with the Wall Street Crash of 1929. In a single day, the stock market prices crashed. As a result, $10 to $15 billion was lost. There were many factors leading up to the Great Depression.

The Roaring 20s (1920s) featured booming industries and prosperity, or good fortune. The automobile was invented. Spirits were high, and people seemed invincible (powerful). This led to consumerism, a time when people were obsessed with shopping for new things. People bought things on "easy credit," meaning they would pay for the items later. Investors even bought stocks using money loaned from the stockbroker, called "buying on margin."

The assembly line, modern technology, and new machinery created an abundance of consumer goods. However, these new machines created goods too quickly. Then the stock market crashed. There were too many goods, and nobody was buying anymore.

The Federal Reserve had low-interest rates during the 1920s. Banks took too many risks. By 1928, banks tried to raise the interest rates, but it only slowed down the economy. With no federal regulations on banks in the 1920s, small banks used customers' savings to lend money to stockbrokers to buy on margin. Unfortunately, with the stock market crash, small banks closed. The banks that survived stopped offering credit.

More than 20,000 businesses went bankrupt, meaning there was no way to pay creditors the debt owed. This directly affected Americans. People lost their savings, jobs, and homes.

Meanwhile, America couldn't export goods. Europe had imposed a tax on American imported goods, making everything too expensive. Farmers and their new technology began to overproduce their crops. So, they had to lower their prices. Then, in 1932 there was a drought, which turned the soil to dust. The Dust Bowl, a series of severe dust storms in the prairies, destroyed 100 million acres of land. Livestock was killed, and crops were ruined. Three million people became unemployed and homeless.

As a result of these consequences, massive amounts of Americans became unemployed - over 12 million people.
