

from the tanker ship Westenholz, the battleship assumed a southerly course. On September 27 the Deutschland was granted authorization to commence a raiding mission against French and British sea traffic. Following this, the battleship sank a British cargo ship, the Stonegate, off the Bermuda Islands on October 5 (but only after evacuating the latter ship's crew to the battleship). Four days later the Deutschland captured an American vessel, the City of Flint, which was carrying a cargo to Great Britain. The captured crew was replaced by German crewmen and the ship was dispatched to Germany as a prize. Three more ships were bothered over the following couple of days: Norway's Jacob Christensen and the tanker Kongsdal were stopped and released after document examination; the Norwegian cargo ship Lorentz W. Hansen was sunk during an encounter off Newfoundland.

The Deutschland made a failed attempt in late October to fuel up from the supply ship Westenholz. Because of a heavy storm the battleship sustained some light damage (including a flooded propulsion system) and was only able to rendezvous a few days later, on the 25th. She was subsequently ordered back to the Reich for engine repairs.

November 16 marked the ship's transfer under a new commander, Kapitän zur See August Thiele. Towards the end of the month the battleship accompanied some cruisers and destroyers on a brief patrol of Skagerrak waters, from where she returned to Wilhelmshaven and passed through the Kiel Canal en route to Gdynia (which the Germans called Götenhafen at the time) in order to divert the Allies' attention from the battleships Scharnhorst and Gneisenau, which were both moving in a westward direction. The Deutschland underwent an overhaul in the shipyard in Gdansk (called Danzig by the Germans). Having completed dock trials, the ship was redesignated on January 25 at Hitler's personal request from a "Panzer-schiff" to a heavy cruiser and at the same time renamed from Deutschland to Lützow (in honor of a Prussian officer from the period of the Napoleonic Wars). The battleship's name was changed for three reasons: firstly, North-Atlantic operations being planned at the time required secrecy and concealment of German warships for as long as was possible; secondly, a heavy cruiser (Lützow of the Admiral Hipper-class) was being built and soon to be sold to the USSR, which was also worth camouflage; thirdly and most importantly, in the event of sinking the ship, the enemy could possibly exploit such a fact for propaganda purposes by foretelling an end to Germany not unlike the end of the Bismarck and after her.
