There is little doubt that the political situation in Mexico during the 1990s was characterized by a change in the nature of the political system. The 1990s began with the transition from authoritarianism to a more democratic system. This change was brought about by a combination of factors, including the economic crisis of the 1980s, the rise of the National Action Party (PAN) in the 1990s, and the death of the long-time ruler, Miguel Alemán. The 1990s also saw the emergence of a new political class, the "New Leaders," who were more open to democratic principles and more willing to accept the results of free elections. This change in the political system was reflected in the 1995 general election, in which the PAN won the presidency for the first time in 32 years. The 1990s were a period of significant political change in Mexico, and the 1995 election was a key moment in this process.
