- How do the characteristics described through research differ between men and women and children?
 - Gender differences: generally, men are more assertive, preferring risk to the more cautious behavior of women.
 - Children: are children who are older, longer in time, more experienced, and have a greater understanding of the world are more likely to take a risk.
 - Age: understanding the world more deeply than the other factors makes age a significant factor. Those who understand the world more clearly are confident, have more goals, and actively seek rewards. They are generally more confident, more "rational" and more willing to face the risk than the less confident and more fearful children.
 - Gender and age: are not independent. The two can interact. Gender may be more important than age in children but more greatly with age (possibly because the shape of brain development is different in children and adults).
 - Age and gender: are not independent. It is a combination.
 - Other variables: such as culture, race.
