

Stages of Memory

1. Encoding- refers to how you transform a physical, sensory input into a representation that can be placed into memory.
 2. Storage- refers to how you store (keep) encoded information in memory.
 3. Retrieval- refers to how you gain access to information stored in memory.
- Forms of encoding (How it differs)
 - Short-Term storage- In short-term memory we seem to encode largely in acoustic form (how it sounds). Info in short term can have errors based on the sounds of similar words. The acoustic code is more important than the visual code, as shown in the Conrad Experiment.
 - Long-Term storage- In long term memory appears to be encoded in a semantic form (word meaning) also some visual coding.
 - When information is transferred from short-term memory to Long-term memory, we encounter 2 key problems: interference and decay.
 - Interference: competing information interferes with our storing information
 - EX: You have watched two crimes with the same actor. You then try to remember the story line of one of the movies but mix it up the second movie. You are experiencing interference.
 - Decay: forgetting facts just because time passes.
 - To move information into long-term memory:
 - Elaborative rehearsal- elaborates on items to be remembered. something the person already knows and meaningfully connects to another less known.
 - Maintenance rehearsal- repeats items to be remembered. Temporarily maintains info in short term without transferring to long term.
 - Memory consolidation: the process of integrating (joining) new information into stored information.
 - REM Sleep- Research suggests that memory processes in the hippocampus are influenced by the production and integration of new cells into the neural network. REM sleep plays an important role in synaptic consolidation, whereby memories are strengthened that previously were organized in slow-wave (deep) sleep.
 - Metacognition: our ability to think about and control our own processes of thought and ways of enhancing our thinking. Thinking about how we think.
 - Metamemory: strategies involve reflecting on our own memory processes to improve our memory.
