

of other ancient literature and history. For example, one result which was reached by all such students as we have in view was that our first three Gospels had all been composed at a considerable interval of time after the events which they narrated and gave an belated belief in one or another little society of Christians at the time at which they were written, and laded with their actual historical data a good deal of later reflection and interpretation. Later experience had coloured the narrative of fact, and special aims and interests were reflected in some of the narratives when compared with others. This is true of the first three Gospels. It is still more conspicuous in the fourth, which is to be regarded as a theological treatise—an interpretation of the significance of Jesus in the scheme of things, suggested by the writer's own experience and the Logos-philosophy—rather than as a history of the details of His life and teaching while He was on earth.

No new apologetic was required, and while many students were in search of some way of defending the Christian Religion without abandoning its traditional basis in history, the Abbot Lacey was one of the first to come forward with the theory that the Christian Faith was independent of any of the results of the historical and literary criticisms of the Gospels. The Faith of the Church—in its whole doctrinal and institutional system—might be true, though the historical facts on which it had been believed to rest were other than had been supposed; although, that is to say, it can be traced as a gradual growth and development from historical beginnings not ascertainable in detail as to the facts and our Lord's own consciousness and
