Tone Chronicles

Our theme in this edition of the Quest begs a fair question that deserves your consideration... As a guitarist, who are you and where are you headed? Are you exploring sound to define your identity as a musician, or do you merely enjoy experiencing the differences among instruments with little concern for discovering your own signature tone? To what extent are you stylistically crippled by your biases? We'd like to suggest that whenever the sounds you're hearing from your gear put a smile on your face, you have tapped into the stuff that truly enables us to play as individuals with a unique and meaningful identity.

Guitarists, songwriters and even designers and builders of gear do well to unwaveringly remain in character, for when we stray too far from who we are (usually under the spell of someone else's magic whom we admire), our work can suffer for it. Art becomes "conflicted" when we struggle to be something or someone we're not. It seems as if most of our heroes have learned this lesson well: it is their unique grasp of their identity as artists that we recognize and honor every bit as much as great "chops." Lots of players have great chops, but a scant few are ever significantly acknowledged and rewarded for it. Why? Great guitarists are fully recognized and appreciated only when they are enabled by great songs.
