

Writing Task: Exploratory Paper

Writing an exploratory essay will be the first of two writing tasks in this course. Writing an exploratory paper, you

1. identify a topic or problem in one of the primary texts of this course
2. formulate and ask questions about the text
3. gather information from secondary literature on the specific topic/problem
4. share this information with readers in the form of the short paper.

Instead of providing a clear yet argumentative answer to the question/questions as you would in the thesis statement, the purpose of the exploratory essay is to reflect on and discuss your thinking process as you read and work through the primary text, your questions about it, and the preliminary answers and approaches you find when doing research on them.

The exploratory paper prompts you to look at the topic/problem identified in the primary text from various perspectives without having yet to settle on one reading, as the thesis statement will require you to do. Writing this type of paper is a first step into more thorough research on the primary text and a methodological/theoretical frame for a fully developed term paper. In the exploratory paper, you can explore the primary text and existing scholarly research on it and reflect on your thinking process.

Reading the primary text:

As you are reading the primary text, pay attention to and answer the following questions:

- What is the primary text about? What is its genre? When was it written and by whom?
- What themes and topics in the text relate to the topic section or to the more general topics of this seminar?
- What literary strategies or literary devices does the primary text use?
- What is a relevant interpretative problem that is raised by the primary text and how is it identified and discussed in the secondary literature?

Researching the primary text:

As your exploratory essay will not only state the question(s) you raise about the primary text but will also include engaging with (a selection of) ideas that other researchers have discussed about the text/topic/question, the next step will be for you to locate and read a selection of secondary literature (start with the secondary literature in our seminar folder and research scholarly sources in the UB databases, e.g., MLA International Bibliography, LiteratureOnline, JSTOR, library catalog, etc.).

Your exploratory paper must refer to at least two to three recent, pieces of literary criticism relevant to the primary text and topic (monographs; scholarly papers, etc.).
