

Executive Summary: Acknowledgment of the importance of primary care has grown in recent years, but California still faces an acute shortage of primary care providers. To help address primary care physician pipeline issues, we conducted interviews with 23 students, faculty, and associate deans in 10 of California's medical schools regarding primary care education at their institutions. Based on this assessment, we identified strengths, gaps and best practices in primary care education at California medical schools.

Current strengths in primary care medical education include

- a commitment of primary care faculty to patient care and education,
- opportunities for students to have meaningful experiences in an area of interest (e.g., underserved care in free clinics), and
- many innovative best practices at individual schools.

The gaps in primary care education include:

- difficulty in finding opportunities for students to have clinical training experiences in high-functioning primary care settings and engage with satisfied, happy primary care providers. This was the most important gap identified by respondents.
- disparity in work life, prestige and income that students perceive between primary care and non-primary care fields.

Based on these finding, we recommended the following:

- 1) Immerse students in the primary care team by providing preclinical students with authentic roles in positions such as health coaching or student-run clinic;
- 2) Increase partnerships between medical schools and team-based, high-functioning primary care practices to ensure that students are trained in advanced primary care settings;
- 3) Develop continuity and sub-internship experiences in advanced primary care settings, including the opportunity for students to follow their own panel of primary care patients for at least 6 months each year;
- 4) Develop a Primary Care Leadership Academy at every medical school to promote learner engagement in primary care innovations efforts; support career interests in primary care; and enhance primary care education, mentoring and advocacy;
