77. Several investigations in nonhuman primates indicate a general functioning of two or three distinct systems, one for automatic, stereotyped, reflexive, and/or conditioned responses, and another for more voluntary, goal-directed, flexible, and/or learned responses. The differences in the two systems are characterized by the relative speed of the responses, by the degree of control of the responses, and by the degree of flexibility in the execution of the responses.<sup>78</sup>

Abstract

While the focus is on the rising use of different communication and training group models and outside the classroom, the authors also discuss emerging technology and e-learning and provide a further look at the growing focus on the importance of the workplace for the 21st-century workforce.

The main objectives of the Singaporean government were to develop industries based on labour-intensive operations, manufacturing, export-oriented companies. The government provided incentives, subsidised land and other services. By setting down these strategies, Singapore was able to attract a number of foreign investors, mostly from established Singaporean firms, to build up the manufacturing sector (Goh 1990) and to create a strong base of manufacturing (Goh 1990) and to create a strong base of manufacturing (Goh 1990) and to create a strong base of manufacturing (Goh 1990).
