Abstract: The aim of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and physiological characteristics of young elite female basketball players. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting. The participants were 12 young elite female basketball players, aged 18-20 years, who were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The experimental group underwent a 12-week training program that included strength, endurance, and agility training. The control group did not undergo any training. The physical and physiological characteristics of the participants were measured at the beginning and end of the 12-week period. The results showed that the experimental group had significant improvements in their physical and physiological characteristics compared to the control group. The improvements were observed in the following variables: maximum oxygen consumption ($\dot{V}O_{2\max}$), maximum heart rate (HR_{max}), maximum power (P_{max}), maximum velocity (V_{max}), maximum acceleration (A_{max}), and maximum deceleration (D_{max}). The control group did not show any significant changes in these variables. The findings of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical and physiological characteristics of young elite female basketball players.
