

Yeast Population Lab

Introduction:

What are yeasts?

Yeasts are unicellular organisms that belong to the kingdom fungi. One of the characteristics of yeast is its ability to ferment (change) sugars into alcohol. The most commercially significant yeasts are the related species: Saccharomyces cerevisiae. This species is used to ferment the sugars of rice, wheat, barley, and corn to produce alcoholic beverages and in the baking industry to expand, or raise, dough. This species is commonly known as baker's yeast.

Yeasts reproduce asexually by budding off a copy of itself or sexually by creating spores (tiny fungi seeds). They live in various habitats including: plant leaves, flowers, soil, salt water, skin, and live symbiotically inside the intestines of warm blooded animals. Yeasts can reproduce rapidly and can cause infections in animals and humans. Common yeast infections include: diaper rash, thrush of the throat, and vaginal infections. The eukaryotic cells of yeasts are used to study genetics because the cell processes are similar to other eukaryotes including mammals.

The yeast's function in baking is to ferment (break down) sugars present in the flour or dough. This fermentation gives off carbon dioxide and ethanol. The carbon dioxide is trapped within tiny bubbles and results in the dough expanding, or rising. The fermentation of wine is caused by naturally occurring yeasts present in the grape plant. The bubbles in sparkling wines are trapped carbon dioxide, the result of yeast fermenting sugars in the grape juice.

All species have a high reproductive potential (population growth). Insects and fish, for example, typically lay several hundred eggs, while clams can release several thousand eggs. Normally, this huge potential is kept in check by the carrying capacity (resources available) of the environment.

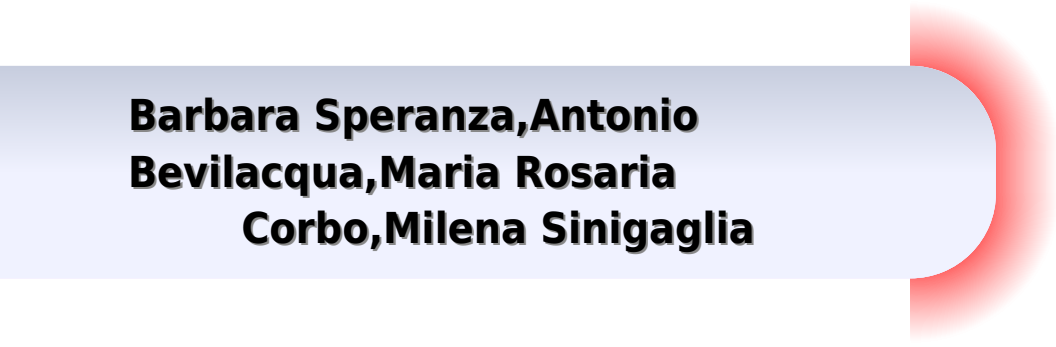

During this laboratory session you will explore the rate of growth of a population of yeast cells in a simple ecosystem (a test tube) and will study a mathematical model of population growth. (Refer to notes on population growth)
