Example answers

The method for the first experiment in A was quite good, but it was only done with one group for each situation and was only done in one city, Chicago. It would be better if they did it with lots of groups and in different cities to see if the results were consistent. The result isn't surprising to me as I think all social interactions can contribute to our happiness.

The method for the experiment in text C was also quite good, but as with the experiment in A, the psychologists should have expanded the experiment. For example, they should have swapped the roles of each group because it could be that some people are naturally more collaborative than others. The results they found are quite surprising as you wouldn't think walking in step with someone would have such a big effect later on.

I think the method that Robert Provine used in text D was good as he studied people in a normal environment not a lab. He also looked at over 2,000 cases over ten years, so his research is likely to be accurate. I don't think the results are that surprising because I think I laugh a lot more with other people than when I'm on my own.
