The last important point about the economic and business climate in the Middle East is that, while there are many successful companies, there are also many struggling ones. In fact, the region is often described as a "land of two halves." On the one hand, there are many successful companies, but on the other hand, there are many struggling ones. This is due to a number of factors, including the lack of a strong legal system, the prevalence of corruption, and the lack of a strong financial system. However, there are also many successful companies in the region, and the overall economic and business climate is improving.
