Principles and Strategies of Teaching and Designing IEP for Learners with Difficulty Seeing, Hearing, and Communicating

Having difficulty seeing, hearing, and communicating makes perceiving and interpreting the environment a struggle, most importantly when the environment is inaccessible. This makes mobility, communication, social interaction and learning academic skills more complicated compared to that of nondisabled learners. In teaching these groups of learners, it is important to understand that there is a wide range of levels of visual, hearing and communication difficulties, which implicate varied strategies and programs to fit in their educational needs. Hence, no two cases, even of the same condition, are completely the same; so as no two individuals are exactly alike. Let this chapter serve its purpose in presenting different ways in teaching learners with difficulty seeing, hearing, and communicating.

Intended Learning Outcome (ILO)

Create safe, inclusive, culturally responsive learning environments for learners with difficulty seeing, hearing, and communicating through the development of an IEP.

ENGAGE

In the Philippines, learners with blindness and deafness usually attend self-contained classes through schools such as the School for the Deaf, School for the Blind and other Special Education centers. Although these learners were traditionally segregated in special education schools, inclusion in the regular classroom is being practiced in the country, most especially that it is cited as a program option in the DepEd Order 72, series of 2009, also known as the Inclusive Education as Strategy for Increasing Participation Rate of Children (Department of Education, 2009). In line with this, inclusion is viewed as educating an increasing number of pupils in mainstream schools and fewer or none in the special schools, but another view states that inclusion is about pupils receiving a good education, whether that is in a special school or in a mainstream school (Farrell, 2006). This leads us to questions: Are special schools not inclusive schools? Can inclusive education truly meet the needs of learners with disabilities, giftedness, and talents? These questions move beyond looking at placement of learners as indication of whether they are included or segregated, as expounded by Powers (1996), "Inclusion is an attitude not a place."

Wherever the learners may be, attitudes for beginning teachers are suggested below:

Make a background check. In the beginning of the school year, make sure to make a background check of all your students, including their talents, skills, and medical conditions. Preparation will help reduce half of your classroom management issues as this will help you identify the kind of learners you will be having in your classroom, and plan ahead in developing an accommodating and accepting atmosphere inside the class.
