What is photosynthesis? How does it work? Who needs it? An astronaut looking at Earth from space sees a green and blue planet. The oceans provide the blue, and billions of plants provide the green view of land. The Sun is the source of energy in the form of light and heat. Photosynthesis is the process by which plants make food. The word means "putting together with light." Photosynthesis occurs inside the leaves of a plant. The leaves contain a green substance called chlorophyll. This substance traps and absorbs the blue and red parts in sunlight and converts them into a form of energy within the plant. Other pigments of different colors in some plants capture the light as well. Plants with different colors, such as seaweed, use these pigments to capture sunlight, as well as chlorophyll. Their leaves may be a different color.

Water is absorbed by the roots of the plant and carried up the stem to the leaves. The stomata, which are tiny holes in the underside of leaves, absorb carbon dioxide from the air. The water, carbon dioxide, and energy created by the sunlight and chlorophyll are converted into a simple form of sugar called glucose. This occurs in a series of chemical reactions fueled by the trapped sunlight. The plant stores this glucose as food to fuel the cells. It also uses glucose to make starch and cellulose. Oxygen is also released from the leaves during the day. At night, oxygen is taken in and carbon dioxide is released. Water also evaporates through the stomata on the underside of the leaves.

So photosynthesis is the process by which plants make food. This is the basic food for animals and humans. We all need photosynthesis for life to survive on the planet.
