Multi-state longitudinal studies are generally very expensive. Sometimes several cost saving strategies can be employed. For example, the probability of being in the study can be affected by providing monetary incentives just after the previous follow-up. Monitoring and adjustment in the participant's follow-up status can be implemented at the time of previous follow-up visits. Also, the study can be made more efficient by stopping subjects who are unlikely to return for future follow-up and return about previous study visits. The reader can find the appropriate type of follow-up strategy in the literature.
