Re: Supporting Documents for a Job Application and Labor and Industry Job Application

When you're applying for a job, an employer may want more information than just a copy of your resume and cover letter. This supporting info request will be listed as "Supporting Documentation" in complete your application. Knowing what to include and how to include it will help you stay in the running for that job.

What Are Supporting Documents?

Supporting documentation for a job application may include a resume, a cover letter, educational transcripts, writing samples, previous employment documents, portfolio, certifications, a reference list, letters of recommendation, and other documents as specified in the job posting. The information that is required varies depending on the job and the employer's hiring requirements.

Also, carefully, employers will specify which documents they want you to include with your application.

It may seem that the job listing employer is asking for supporting documents that are not necessary for the job. The reason for this is that the employer is not asking for the documents that are not necessary for the job. The employer is asking for the documents that are necessary for the job. The employer is asking for the documents that are necessary for the job.

Why Do Employers Request Supporting Documents?

During supporting documentation, employers hope companies evaluate applicants. For many employers, a resume is a resume and a cover letter is a cover letter. But employers also want to see if you can write. They want to see if you can write. They want to see if you can write. They want to see if you can write.

The reason for requesting information is to get a full picture of you as a candidate, not to provide information of the details listed in your resume or job application. For instance, requesting a transcript or supporting
