

In the U.S., 1 of the top 5 causes of disability are anxiety and depression. And nearly 90% of the population is estimated to be chemically impaired, either with depression or anxiety (1998). 10% of people related mental health to a primary work affecting factor (any working hours, financial problems, lack of work-life balance, lack of physical activity, social problems). 80% of U.S. employees who identified as stressed, described their stress and engagement in the same terms. The negative isn't a place where uncomfortable signs like mental health are not discussed openly. But issues relating to mental health are not seen as a weakness and, therefore, especially in the workplace. (Schwartz, 2004). Employees learn to keep their stress and health issues discreet and avoid health issues.

Several health communication, provided in Western markets, were not going to be effective in the C-19, especially in the marketplace, where not sharing one's feelings or emotions helps people keep strong and not succumb. A completely different tactic to achieve the goals of health awareness for mental health was needed. So a collection of suspenseful feelings was collected from those dealing with mental health issues. With over 10 entries, from all over the region, unique visual illustrations were created, capturing those suspenseful feelings. The illustrations were then compiled, along with the relevant questions, and a book, titled "Suspense, not", was published, available to consumers and other consumers at their own words.
