transatlantic steamship La Provence was a swift and comfortable vessel under the command of a most affable man. The passengers constituted a select and delightful society. The charm of new acquaintances and improvised amusements served to make the time pass agreeably. We enjoyed the pleasant sensation of being separated from the world, living as it were upon an unknown island and consequently obliged to be sociable with each other. Have you ever stopped to consider how much originality and spontaneity emanate from these various individuals who on the preceding evening did not even know each other and who are now for several days condemned to lead a life of extreme intimacy, jointly defying the anger of the ocean, the terrible onslaught of the waves, the violence of the tempest and the agonizing monotony of the calm and sleepy water. Such a life becomes a sort of tragic existence with its storms and its grandeurs, its monotony and its diversity, and that is why perhaps we embark upon that short voyage with mingled feelings of pleasure and fear.
