What's new: The authors have identified a new type of cell that may be involved in the development of the brain. The cell is called a "neural stem cell" and is found in the hippocampus, a region of the brain that is important for learning and memory. The authors found that these cells can differentiate into neurons, which are the cells that transmit signals in the brain. This discovery could have important implications for understanding the development of the brain and for treating neurological disorders.

■ A number of researchers do not see the current research as a promising avenue for understanding the brain. "The current research is very limited in its scope," says Dr. Michael Posner, a leading expert on attention at the University of Michigan. "It's a very narrow view of the brain, and it's not clear how it can be used to understand the brain in general."
