

General

General, hydraulically steered pusher axle

Pusher axle

The pusher axle has the same design as a front axle of the FRAX-BAS type. For description of FRAX-BAS, see Service informationen Group 60, "Wheel suspension and steering FM, FH".

The pusher axle is placed in front of the drive axle and is activated when the front axle's wheel deflection is greater than 5". When the pusher axle is not used it can be lifted up from ground level. Even when lifted up the pusher axle will turn with the front axle.

The use of a steerable pusher axle results in less tyre wear in comparison with the used of a fixed pusher axle (PA-FDG). The steerability of the pusher axle ensures that it is possible to make sharp turns on loose surfaces, without the wheels dragging the surface with it.

Wheel base adjustments are simplified in comparison with a mechanically steered pusher axle, since this only involves the replacement of hydraulic pipes.

The components that activate the hydraulically steered pusher axle can be seen in "Foldout A Hydraulically steered pusher axle".

Hydraulic control system

The object of the pusher axle's steering system is to transfer the steering movements from the front axle to the pusher axle by means of hydraulic power. The power is transferred via hydraulic pipes from a master cylinder to a centring cylinder, which in turn activates the pusher axle. The pusher axle is centred if a fault should occur in the vehicle's ordinary servo system, and then has the same function as a fixed pusher axle.
