storytelling both engaging and illuminating making this a staple for any literary collection The Web of the Golden Spider Frederick Bartlett, 2014-11-05 In his aimless wanderings around Boston that night Wilson passed the girl twice and each time though he caught only a glimpse of her lithe form bent against the whipping rain the merest sketch of her somber features he was distinctly conscious of the impress of her personality As she was absorbed by the voracious horde which shuffled interminably and inexplicably up and down the street he felt a sense of loss The path before him seemed a bit less bright the night a bit more barren And although in the excitement of the eager life about him he quickly reacted he did not turn a corner but he found himself peering beneath the lowered umbrellas with a piquant sense of hope Wilson's position was an unusual one for a theological student He was wandering at large in a strange city homeless and penniless and yet he was not unhappy in this vagabondage Every prowler in the dark is consciously or unconsciously a mystic He is in touch with the unknown he is a member of a universal cabal The unexpected the impossible lurk at every corner He brushes shoulders with strange things though often he feels only the lightest breath of their passing and hears only a rustle like that of an overturned leaf But he knows either with a little shudder and a startled glance about or with quickened pulse and eager waiting
