Abstract: Understanding of public perceptions of food as both good and bad for health is needed to develop public health messages. We tested the hypothesis that people would rate foods as good or bad for health based on their perceived health status. We conducted a survey of 1,000 people in the United States. Results showed that people with higher perceived health status rated more foods as good for health, while people with lower perceived health status rated more foods as bad for health. These findings suggest that public health messages should be tailored to the perceived health status of the target audience.
