

In effective elementary classrooms that produce high language arts achievement, children are highly engaged because skills and strategies are taught with rich opportunities for application to real reading and writing experiences. Teachers provide positive literacy models and scaffolded support as they work with students. They also allow students to work independently (Pressley, Gaskins, Sedie, & Collins, 2006).

Such schools are not always the norm. As we work with teachers and teacher candidates in literacy, we frequently see fragmented implementation of aspects of a comprehensive literacy program, but rarely do we see all those parts put together into a meaningful whole. One teacher may closely follow a basal reading program. Another may use technology to motivate independent reading. Still others are so focused on phonics that they overlook vocabulary. And then there are teachers who are so anxious to get their students ready for the tests that they overlook the need for more authentic motivation. Some teachers say they know what they should be doing, but they just don't have the time to do it. They say they have too many other demands placed on them. Still others do not know how to begin organizing time and resources to present a balanced program. This discrepancy among teachers can be seen at times within the same school building. Children in a high-quality, literacy-rich classroom one year can make great progress but slow their growth and lose their enthusiasm in a different classroom the following year (Jacob, Lefgren, & Sims, 2010).

Purpose

We wrote this book to give a comprehensive view of all the elements that are essential to develop effective literacy and provide the necessary gradual release of responsibility from teachers to students (Mooney, 1990; Mooney & Young, 2006; Pearson & Gallagher, 1983). Like the oft-repeated story of the blind man and the elephant, many literacy educators focus on the trunk, the legs, or the tail. What today's students need are more teachers who see the whole elephant—the big picture—and consistently implement what they know.

When we observe preservice teachers and their mentors, we also notice that writing is sometimes overlooked. A high number of students are not developing the competencies they need in writing (Persky, Daase, & Jin, 2005). Most teachers are concerned about reading success, as they should be, but some do not see writing as an important component in literacy growth. In this text, reading and writing are both treated in each chapter, rather than as separate chapters. We hope that you will see interconnections between the two and teach both reading and writing in your literacy curriculum. Ideally, writing leads to reading, and reading leads to writing. In fact, on close examination writing is reading, because authors are composing meaning; and reading is writing, because readers are also composing meaning. Competent readers and writers usually engage in these meaning-making processes interactively (Fitzgerald & Shanahan, 2000).
