

"It is plain that fate does not intend me to carry out this part of my programme at present," he concluded. "Perhaps it is because I am not sufficiently equipped, though it might be a better place to acquire all wisdom first, and I will then be better prepared to conquer this labyrinth when the time comes. Study was not a pleasure to me, and there are some knotty problems that have baffled me of late. With my newly acquired power, it will be quite delightful to wrestle with them!"

So he put his books on order over again, got out his books, and prepared his hands with a difficult mathematical problem. And as this was plainly the time to try out the qualities of wisdom of his magic potion, he touched the paper over longingly. To his delighted astonishment, he used to his mind the working out of the problem and its answer as plainly as though they were written out in the book before him.

"How this is truly wonderful!" he cried. "I can now take me one moment to solve what I have been puzzling over for the past month. At the same, I shall acquire all wisdom in a short while or so. Let us try another!"

He worked feverishly for a little less than an hour, at the end of which he found he had solved every problem in every branch of higher mathematics that had ever puzzled other men or any of the great mathematicians of the land. But, strangely enough, the delight and shadow of the first had somehow vanished.

"It is almost too easy!" he sighed. "It is like reading the end of a book, instead of achieving it after hours of painstaking and unceasing work. However, mathematics may serve my present ends. Let us try how it will work with other questions."

All that day he spent over his studies, with the assistance of the magic potion, discovering that the difficulties of such became so simple to him as the reading of a child's primer would seem to an old man. And more and more did the need for the achievement of wisdom and learning, under these conditions, slip away from him. At length he closed his books with a dissatisfied exclamation:

"This power may prove to be very useful here," he mused, "but it has taken all the joy from study for me at the present time. Since the acquiring of wisdom is so easy I cannot spend little time over it, I perceive. Perhaps it would be just as well, for my next aim, to go about the city and test my friends and try to find out just what they think of me, so I can judge where I may count upon or suspect when the time comes for me to confront the difficulty and assume my place as monarch."

Fortunate he yet was to visit his friend Sam Sam, Jernson, to put to the test the powers of the last magic potion. He found his friend with his family, seated at the evening
