Using the novel BRISQ tool, we are capable of quantitatively assess content in an objective manner. BRISQ will not categorize any particular video but will be able to compare single channel, channel groups, input or combined input to a baseline. The accuracy will not be lower than that achieved with BRISQ algorithms and will be able to compare input and baseline from the improvement in BRISQ (BRISQ) resulting in higher scores for the use of the experimental process and lower score of baseline input.

It has been argued (e.g., [10]) that the use of these models might be improved if the uncertainty in these models is considered, for instance by averaging the resulting period and amplitude estimates obtained from several different models. The same general strategy of averaging estimates from a limited number of different models has been used in other contexts (e.g., [11]). For each period estimate obtained by applying a particular model, we used the period estimate from [10] (the 'reference' model) as the 'true' value, and the difference of the period estimate from the reference model was used as the 'error'.

We have used each of our three strategies when searching for relevant literature. However, we did not search for relevant papers in the reference lists of relevant papers.

Book Review: It was 1893, the year that the first American automobile was built. The car was a simple, open-top vehicle with a steering wheel and a single gear. It was a marvel of engineering, but it was also a very expensive and unreliable mode of transportation. The car was built by a man named Henry Ford, who was a pioneer in the mass production of automobiles. Ford's car was the first of many that would follow, and it would revolutionize the way we travel.
